ORPET SOUGHT A PHYSICIAN

Wanted One That Had "Not Too Many Scruples"

Wankegan, Ill., Feb. 18 .- Evidence that Marian Lambert, for whose death William H. Orpet, Wisconsin university student, is held, fought desperately against the poison by which she was killed, was uncovered yesterday by the prosecution. Acid crystals of the supposed poison were found under the nails of the dead girl's right hand, as though in shoving away a poison phial the acid had been spilled on her fingers or she had dipped her nails in the liquid. It was the right hand that held the school books and it was her right hand that was burned with acid. The schoolbooks noticeably were unstained. The deep significance of this, the prose cution contends, is that Marian Lambert did not die with her schoolbooks in her hand, but that after her death her body was carefully arranged and posed by her slayer. In any struggle, the state contends, it must have been the right hand that the girl used to ward off the poison thus getting the acid on her left cheek. The poison phial that contained the drug that killed the 18-year-old girl is Lavender, secured from purple dye, harmonizes with a gray border.

And then, there are the striped rugs, the stripes being as a rule two inches wide, and the colors alternating. In this style blue and white stripes, lavender and gray, brown and white and brown and old rose are all pretty. Again, there is the old favorite, the "hit and miss" rug, which is nearly always pleasing to the eye. The rags for rugs should be cut twice as wide as carpet rags. When rags are torn, all corners should be trimmed. The weaver should use but a single chain in weaving rugs. When the double chain is used the rug is very likely to look like a piece of rarg carpet. A convenient sized rug is one two yards long and 27 inches wide. Some prefer to knot the fringe at the ends of the rugs, while others clip the fringe, and bind the ends. The writer recently was able to get a beautiful room-size rug from an old ingrain or imported carpet. The widths were carefully washed and cut into strips about an inch wide. The strips were cut the long way. They were cut entirely off and afterward sewed together. Cutof the strip would have been easier, but would have made many rough places or red and green chain. Each rug was made were all the same width.
